I Shirley A. Reardon wish to appeal the revocation of my Washington non-resident license. I had done one set of finger print cards when I first started working for Connexions on the United Health Group account. In December I received a letter stating that my fingerprints had been rejected. Also in the letter I received new fingerprints cards to have them redone. I went to the police station and had them redone. I turned them into my employer Connexions and they said that they would take care of it. I never received a letter stating that the second set of fingerprint cards had been rejected. I had no clue that they were rejected.

I received a certified letter in late January. I signed for the letter on my way out the door but I was going out of town so I laid it on the table in the apartment. When I got home, the letter wasn't where it was suppose to be. My roommates didn't know where it was, they had moved it off the table. We were cleaning the apartment one weekend early February when we found the letter. It was unopened so I opened it and found out that my Washington license had been revoked. I didn't know what to do since the license had already been revoked. I advised my work when I found out and they had already knew. I was waiting to see what my employer wanted to do since I wasn't selling insurance in Washington right know. I have switched accounts and now I work on Anthem which doesn't sell in Washington. We thought that since we weren't selling in Washington that we didn't have to do anything about it. Then we found out that it wasn't the case.
